Abstract

Emerging Singaporean contemporary artists Hilmi Johandi and Dave Lim adopt methods in animation production to ask questions about their contemporary existences. Neither are animators. Johandi, as a painter disengaged with historical archive materials and locations before his time, uses animation to reveal this intellectual and emotional disassociation, trimming away any form of human activity in his recent exhibition 'Exposition'. He asks: how do we consider the places that no longer exist, except in texts, in photographs, and in memories? Who are we to make claims to those spaces? Lim engages with surveillance footage of our security obsessed society through playful surreal sequences, making use of the lag time between live footage and live streaming to make animations from screen captures off public security cameras. These works exist in the cracks of high surveillance. Their works consider an artist's place in Singapore's conservative art environment, using animation techniques to give a voice to an art scene that is often silenced. This paper compiles their thoughts and their processes from interviews, and argues for animation that is not solely meant as a storytelling technique, but also as a strategy for thinking, questioning, and criticising in Singapore contemporary art that sits safely within the blurred boundaries of non-fiction and fiction.
